Purdue's Joana Colussi notes Brazil imports nearly all of its urea and about 75% of its phosphate, leaving it exposed to the Strait of Hormuz disruption that affects 40% of the global urea market. Local Brazilian urea prices rose about 35% after the conflict began, while fewer than 30% of farmers had bought fertilizer for the next crop. Fertilizer weighs more on Brazil's cost structure than in the US, pressuring margins and potentially shifting fall planting decisions.
