California is phasing out use of paraquat, a widely used weedkiller that has been associated with serious health issues including Parkinson's disease. All manufacturers of products containing paraquat - dichloride have voluntarily cancelled their California product registrations rather than submit additional health and safety data demanded by state regulators. The state's Department of Pesticide Regulation had initiated a reevaluation citing gaps in the human health toxicology database and potential associations with thyroid effects and birth defects. Health advocates welcomed the phase - out while noting that remaining stocks may still be sold for up to two years.
