Civil Eats reported on July 8 that EPA approved four new pesticides on June 30, three of which qualify as PFAS under an international definition, according to critics. EPA rejects that classification under its own narrower definition and says the products are safe when used according to labels. The approvals also included expanded bifenthrin use on crops such as coffee and some peas and beans, approval of the non - PFAS fungicide fluoxapiprolin, and first food uses of chlormequat on wheat and oats. The article links these pesticide decisions to broader farm PFAS concerns, including sewage sludge used as fertilizer.
